19. Conteúdo da unidade curricular/Syllabus (máx. 200 palavras): This course integrates the ongoing research project on the works of the Portuguese medieval writer and historian, Fernão Lopes. It draws extensively from the companion website and database to the project, the Fernão Lopes Portal.

Students are invited to discover the intersections between Literary Studies and History, as exemplified by the rich content of Lopes's chronicles of the kings of Portugal, and to correlate classical approaches with today's digital approaches to the Humanities. Are the Digital Humanities (DH) a point of arrival or departure?

In tandem, students are introduced to the Fernão Lopes Portal, in order to identify and familiarise with the structuring of a fully working DH medium. This articulates with the hands-on use of the portal's infrastructure to introduce key methodological issues, e.g.: relational database foundations; terminology; text mapping; multimedia integration; curatorship.

Via classroom teaching and individual tutorials, students will develop the tools necessary to carry out their individual projects, based either on a theme, subject, or short segment chosen from the chronicles of Fernão Lopes. The results will feature on the Fernão Lopes Portal website.

Students will be advised on task-specific bibliography.

21. Métodos de ensino/Teaching Methods:

The course is mainly practical with discussion of foundational theoretical issues. The focus will be on thinking through the combination of the research methodology and the technical tools required to bring the students' individual projects to fruition. A big part of the course is based on the hands-on project. Students will be encouraged to bridge scientific knowledge in the Humanities and common technology and to utilise open-access bibliography. In addition to teaching from the course lecturers, there will be contributions from recognised DH practitioners. A one-day fieldtrip to Lisbon as the setting for the chronicles of Fernão Lopes is included in the course.

22. Métodos de avaliação/Assessment methods:
